Pension money: Convicts get 10

It is over. Trial judge Lawrence Gidudu found the three suspects guilty of all the 10 charges they have been battling for the last four years.

BY ANTHONY WESAKA & BETTY NDAGIRE

KAMPALA. It is now settled that former permanent secretary in the Public Service Ministry Jimmy Lwamafa will spend the next seven years in jail after he was found guilty of irregularly budgeting for Shs88.2b.

Mr Christopher Obey, the former principal accountant got the highest sentence of 10 years on grounds that he was a technocrat who should have advised his colleagues on budget formation and execution and further considering that he generated the schedules through which the funds were drained where he was the co-signatory.

Meanwhile, their con-convict, Stephen KiwanukaKunsa, got the least punishment of five years.

Presiding judge Lawrence Gidudu also in his verdict, ordered the trio suspects to jointly compensate government with Shs50b following the financial loss that had occasioned to it.

"Considering the fact that this crime was committed for a period of two years by very senior public servants, it would be a mockery for the fight against corruption for this court to indulging in causing financial loss by causing the convicts to just walk away," justice Gidudu ruled yesterday.

"I am therefore imposing sentence, the sentence that reflects that the practice of justice is not just mercy in favour of the convict but by practice to fight corruption."

The Anti-Corruption Court yesterday found the three top former Ministry of Public Service officials guilty of all the 10 charges that they have been battling for the last four years, saying the prosecution had proved beyond reasonable doubt the guilt of the public officers.

Judge Gidudu said the corruption was hatched in the Public Service ministry, smoothed in the ministry of Finance and perfected in Cairo Bank where the said taxpayers money was paid out to ghost pensioners disguised as payments made to the former employees of the defunct East African Community.

Others convicted include Christopher Obey, a former principal accountant in the Pensions Department, and Stephen KiwanukaKunsa, a former director of research and development in the same ministry.

The suspects had been accused of fraudulently budgeting for more than 88.2b of civil servants' contribution to National Social Security Fund (NSSF) well knowing that civil servants don't contribute to the Fund.

"In view of the findings I have made above, I have come to the conclusion that the prosecution has proved beyond reasonable doubt the charges of causing financial loss in counts
